Bessie Antin Daschbach spearheads the firm's multi-disciplinary Environmental, Social, and Governance (ESG) team, helping clients and the firm navigate ESG issues in support of sustainable growth. For over two decades, Bessie has steered her clients' cases to successful resolutions in litigation. She applies that deep experience to orient clients towards proactive sustainability and ESG solutions, including mitigating environmental and social risks.

Bessie holds a certificate in Sustainable Capitalism & ESG from the University of California, Berkeley, School of Law, Executive Education. She is a long-standing adjunct environmental law professor at Tulane University School of Law, where she designed and teaches the Tulane Masters of Jurisprudence course on sustainability and ESG.

Bessie's long record in high-risk litigation strongly positions her to anticipate and resolve client sustainability and ESG issues. She began her career as a trial and appellate lawyer and accumulated more than twenty years of experience in litigation and arbitration around environmental, international, commercial, and construction disputes. She helped Louisiana landowners resolve claims against some of the largest oil and gas operators in land and groundwater contamination cases. She also led the landmark Southeast Louisiana Flood Protection Authority—East case against nearly 100 oil and gas companies.

Before joining the firm, Bessie handled construction and commercial litigation at a national New Orleans-based firm and a full-service firm in New York City. For more than ten years, Bessie managed the environmental practice at another New Orleans-based firm and was instrumental in launching the firm's international arbitration practice. She also worked with the International Labor Organization in Bangkok, the United Nations Legal Affairs Codification Division, and the Open Society Justice Initiative in New York City.
